The indie community, however, feels production houses are after all, cashing in on a growing supply base for niche content and not necessarily empowering the community.

"With creative control over the film and its rights, production houses have little to lose. If they're here to question the status quo, what are they offering their suppliers? How will an indie film crew sustain after they launch with them, how many festivals will their work be sent to and what are the channels/venues that they are provided with are questions we must ask," says Sudarshan Raghunathan, filmmaker and founder of Banao Creatives that makes indie films.

Many say the technological movement, through its wide reach is rapidly consolidating a fragmented industry where no one can work in isolation anymore. "To survive, a production house needs to have various verticals rolled into itself - for content creation, acquisition, marketing, distribution and monetisation," S Sashikanth of Y Not Studios.

dress such issues," said Carles Torner, executive director of the organisation, during a recent visit to Chennai.

The South India chapter of Pen International will introduce projects to help translate regional works into other languages. "A number of works produced in regional languages are not getting the recognition they deserve. They should reach more people. We will have projects for translating the regional works into other languages," said Torner, who is a popular Catalan poet.

Pen International was founded by British poet and playwright CA Dawson Scott in 1921 as an international club where writers could share ideas. Today, it connects an international community of writers from its headquarters in London, and has chapters in 100 countries,

Pen International will hold its annual congress in Pune in September, said Torner. "It is significant because this is the first time such an event is going to take place in India. The conference will have writers from all over the world. There will be discussions on promoting literature and freedom of expression. We will also discuss the killing of writer-activists Govind Pansare, MM Kalburgi, Narendra Dabholkar and Gauri Lankesh during the event," he said.
